BREWSTER & TANNER

1. I have been thinking about you a lot lately.

We have on a previous occasion pointed out the proof furnished by the Victorian revenue returns, that the condition of the people has not been improved by protection. Still the large revenues that is raised is in itself a proof that this condition cannot be one of distress. Whatever monetary fluctuations may be caused by the speculations of large capitalists, the receipt of a large Customs' revenue is a proof that the people generally are in a position to purchase the comforts and even the luxuries of life. At the same time, while there is no reason simply on the strength of the banking returns to take a cheerless view of the condition of Victoria, there is enough to inspire its legislators with a spirit of caution—enough to recommend a prudent economy, and as much freedom for the industry of the country as is consistent with fiscal prudence.

THE riot at the Ipswich School of Arts, the other day, raised some questions in which we are all interested. The scene presented on the occasion would have been ludicrous had not the disposition to laugh, which it was at one stage adapted to create, been overpowered by the serious character of the subsequent proceedings. The reverend lecturer, whose plain speaking gave apparent cause or excuse for the disturbance, must have presented a somewhat undignified spectacle, when he was being hustled off the platform by the police for safety, and his friends and associates were convincing each other of their steadfastness and zeal, by breaking up the chairs and applying the legs and rails to each other's heads in lieu of argument. But when we are told that kerosene lamps and stones were thrown about, and the knife was resorted to, there is no longer a question as to dignity or indignity. The comic element passes out of sight. The affair becomes a disgrace to the community—a thing to be ashamed of, not to laugh at. And this spectacle was got up in some sense in the name of religion—of the religion of peace—of that religion which, at the very origin discountenanced violence in word and deed,—whose Founder in the hour of utmost peril held in stayance the power of resistance at his command, and told his followers to "put up the sword."

to this very day as an apostasy that destroyed the unity of the faith, and brought into existence a multiplicity of beliefs, and numberless sects that "live and creep in the midst of men." The subject, then, was partly historical and partly religious. The lecturer proposed to deal with certain events that happened some three hundred years ago; those events being of such a character that it was not only impossible to treat them adequately without trenching upon the ground of religious controversy, but even to make a bare and bald statement of them without taking one side or the other, and representing as facts what some dispute as false and malicious inventions. It is evident, even from the title of the lecture, that the lecturer was resolved, in taking up this subject, to make no fruitless attempt to steer a middle course. Believing "the Reformation" to have been a reformation indeed, he did not propose to describe it as half-reformation, half-apostasy. And consequently he did not feel bound to describe the state of things immediately preceding it as a state of things too perfect to be improved. No man could lecture upon the Reformation as a reformation without having something to say about the abuses that provoked and led to it, and about the existence of which it would have been undeserving of that name. Under these circumstances the questions to be considered are, whether—seeing that there are such radical differences of opinion among us—topics of this class are to be wholly tabooed to the public lecturer; whether, if they be held admissible at all, they are to be treated only with a certain reticence and superficiality; and whether, when they are handled, as our correspondent says, "without gloves," there can be any legitimate excuse for the resort to physical violence by those whose sensibilities are interfered with.

As to the first of these questions, one thing is patent. The idea of excluding any class of subjects, however sacred, from the domain of the public lecturer is opposed to the spirit of free inquiry that distinguishes the age. The existence of differences of opinion, feeling, or faith upon any matter of human interest is now-a-days held in free communities to be a reason for instead of against full investigation and discussion. The principle of exclusion, if sound, would be applicable to questions not only of history but of science, and would close the mouths of men whose theories of the universe are at variance with orthodoxy, as well as of those whose views of past events and their causes and consequences are, in the opinion of some characterised by heresy, and full of offence. It is not only the Rev. Mr. PORTER who would be silenced, and Mr. FROUD, but men like HUXLEY and TYNDALL, who, as every one knows, are calmly listened to, and allowed the utmost freedom of speech whilst preaching the anti-gospel of materialism. The spirit of the times is in favour of letting all things be suffered and examined under the play of every cross-light that may be brought to bear upon them. And whilst this process is being carried on through the agency of the Press, it would be absurd to suppose that virtu voce discussion is to be prohibited. This tendency of the age may be alarming to some, and irritating to others; but it should not cause uneasiness to those who believe that truth must ultimately prevail. It should rather to them be matter for rejoicing, for the force of truth is ever weakened by incrustations of error, and these are removed by healthy fiction. But, it may be said, there is a difference between allowing freedom of speech before a scientific association, where many who hear can weigh and judge, and permitting it before a miscellaneous popular assembly, where the majority are unable to do either. It would be well, however, for prohibiting the publication of newspaper reports of certain recent speeches by scientific men, but none against permitting the treatment before a popular audience of such a subject as the history of the Reformation—a story of human action, and motive, coming easily within the range of ordinary men's powers of judgment, and as to which the means of testing the lecturer's assertions or opinions are accessible to almost everybody.

But if it be conceded that subjects of this class are fairly open to treatment by public lecturers before popular assemblies, ought they to be treated with freedom and candour, or with evasion and reserve? Were evasion necessary, the preferable thing would rather be the avoidance of the whole subject. To lecture about LUXURY and gloss over the springs of LOVE and the great objects of his life, would be as offensive to those who regard

THE BISHOP OF SYDNEY ON EDUCATIONAL REFORM.

A very useful document has been issued from the office of the Government Statistician. It commences with a statistical summary of Victorian history from 1836 to 1873, showing the gradual increase in the population of the colony from 1836 to 790,472 in the latter. The figures are amplified and explained in other parts of the report, every branch of the subject being illustrated by facts bearing upon the growth and condition of the country. To the student of the history and progress of Victoria the documents in question will be very acceptable, and it is understood that a large reprint of it will be used for distribution in England. It is to be feared, however, that something less dry and more colorful would be more acceptable to the labouring class in England, to migrate hither.

“CIVILIZATION.”—A new definition of the word “civilization” reaches us from Japan. Last year a Spanish visitor to an English Club was introduced to a Japanese gentleman, and on putting away his third pipe, the latter said, “I have heard that you English consider civilization with great favour, I like civilization. I like civilization!”—Albion.
